

Bucklesberry, Back in the Day

Jeremiah Sutton, Sr. (Part 6)

Jeremiah Sutton, Sr. (1836-1900), known as Jerry, was father of the largest family in Bucklesberry history. Married three times, his first two wives left him a widower with twenty-one children. Only Benjamin Sutton, Jr. (1795-1864), Jerry's uncle, had the same number of wives and children.

Truly a family man, Jerry was an exceptional farmer. Industrious and enterprising, he stayed busy year-round with other work in addition to farming, including operating a fishery and a distillery.

As successful as he was, life was not always smooth sailing for Jerry. He faced tragedies and disappointments, too. For example, in the early 1880s, a purported arson occurred in Jerry's home:

1882, December 6: "The kitchen of Jere[miah, Sr.] Sutton, in Bucklesberry, was found to be on fire about 9 o'clock on last Friday night. Jerry believes that someone acquainted put fire to it." (The Daily Journal, New Bern)

Jerry and his family experienced serious illness in the mid-1880s. A potentially deadly virus found its way into his household with second wife, Sarah (Sallie) Ivey Sutton (1846-1893) and their eight youngest children:

1884, June 18: "Several of Jerry Sutton's family have been confined with measles. The disease has been very severe in many cases." (The Daily Journal, New Bern)

Fortunately, Jerry's children were spared from the death grip of measles that year. But two months later, Jerry himself faced a life-threatening assault from a tenant who lived on his plantation:

1884, August 13: "A difficulty occurred in Bucklesberry last week between Jere[miah, Sr.] Sutton and Bryan Johnson in which Johnson was badly worsted. A judicious use of a hoe upon the forehead felled Johnson, and in the fall his right leg was broken in two places. The difficulty occurred at Sutton's house, the particulars of which I have not learned further than that Johnson was pursuing Sutton with his knife when the blow was given. Johnson is said to be a dangerous man while Sutton is regarded as peaceable." (The Daily Journal, New Bern)

A more serious incident occurred a few years later with yet another tenant on Jerry's farm. The result was a tragic loss of limb:

1889, December 11: "Robert Arnett, living on Jere[miah, Sr.] Sutton's place, had the misfortune to cut his leg last week. The cut was so severe that amputation was necessary." (The Daily Journal, New Bern)

More than once, Jerry experienced the worst grief a parent could know, the death of a child. Sadly, eight of his children preceded him: Maxaline (1853-1864); Fannie (1863-1869); Elsie Susan (1870-1871); Mary Ann (1869-1872); Alonzo Harold (1852-1875); Willie Robert (1890-1892); and twin sons, Dee and L.M. (1894; lived only one day).

Jerry also saw the death of a son-in-law, Edward Herring, the first husband of daughter, Octavia Beatrice (1874-1938):

1899, June 2: "The remains of Mr. Ed. Herring, of Wayne County, were taken through here to Mr. Jerry Sutton's, in Bucklesberry, for interment. He is said to have been a most excellent man." (The Daily Free Press, Kinston)

Jeremiah Sutton, Sr. was not immune from the hardships of life. Rather than succumb, however, he found the grace and strength of character to rise above difficulties and sorrows, a testament to what may have been his greatest success.
